suggested that each route have two corps each with three regiments. Each corps would have a cavalry regiment. [REDACTED] Note: Source does not clearly state whether the cavalry regiment is in addition to or is one of the original three).

They agreed that two cavalry divisions were to be dispatched from East Mongolia [REDACTED] Note: It is not known whether source means the eastern part of Outer Mongolia, or whether he refers to the area around Wangyehmiao (122-01, 46-05), headquarters of the East Mongolian Autonomy Government). These divisions would have Mongolian officers and six to ten Chinese Communists as directing and liaison officers. Furthermore, one infantry unit, one destroying unit, one political unit, and one artillery battalion would be incorporated into one mixed corps, called the Right Wing Advance Army. It would be organized as follows:

- a. 6 cavalry regiments, with 3,000 men.
- b. 3 infantry detachments, with 450 men.
- c. 1 artillery battalion, with 270 men. It would have three companies.

6. [REDACTED] Note: The following contradictory information, ^{was} based on a secret interview with an official of the East Mongolian Autonomy Government.)

25X1X6 The East Mongolian Autonomy Government was entirely instigated and encouraged by Soviet Russia. The Mongols are not particularly interested in the Communist cause, and if the Nationalists would put the chairman, Pu Yen Man Tu, into an important government post, the Mongols would follow him over to the Nationalist side. [REDACTED] suggests that General Ma Chan-shan be appointed to negotiate with the Mongols, as he is very popular among Manchurians because of his resistance struggle against the Japanese. (Pu Yen Man Tu and other officials of the present East Mongolian Government used to be high officials of puppet Manchukuo).

7. There are three major cliques among the Chinese Communists. They are as follows:

a. Soviet Clique

- (1) Chou Pao-chung is the head. He was trained in Russia and came to Manchuria with the Soviet Army after the Japanese surrender. He commands the Northeast Manchurian People's Self-Protection Army. This army is equipped with Soviet weapons, was established to overthrow the imperialist control of Japan, and is not sincerely Communist.

25X1X6

Note: Chou was previously reported as Commanding Officer, Kirin-Liaoning Military Area).

- (2) Tseng Ke-lin, Chou's subordinate, is sometimes listed in the Soviet Clique, since Chou controls his troops; but he belongs to the Manchurian 8th Route Army Clique.
(See below).

25X1X6

- (3) Yu Tien-tang, Harbin Garrison Commander, Note: Also received Yu Tien-feng. Yu Tien-fang? Reported in January to be Chief of Staff, 8th Military Sector at Nanchiang (125-13, 49-11).

b. Yenai Clique

- (1) Lin Piao
- (2) Hsiao Hua
- (3) Ma Chi
- (4) Tsao Li-huai
- (5) The forces of the following men are controlled by Lin Piao, but the men are considered, even by Yenai, to belong to the Manchurian 8th Route Army Clique:

- (a) Lu Cheng-tsao
- (b) Chang Hsueh-shih
- (c) Jan Yi

c. Manchurian 8th Route Army Clique

- (1) Tseng Ke-lin is the head. As explained above, his troops are under the jurisdiction of Chou Pao-chung. These troops are the Northeast People's Autonomy Army, organized after the Japanese surrender. Most of the soldiers are puppet Manchukuo troops and local bad elements. Their morale is low, and they do not believe in any particular doctrine.

- (2) See b (5) above.

8. If the Chinese Nationalist Government adopted effective political and tactical means of pacifying the Soviet Clique, disunity between them and the Yen-an Clique could easily materialize. If Ma Chan-shan were appointed to an important government post in Manchuria, the Yen-an Clique would surrender. If these two cliques were effectively united, the dissolution of the third, the Manchurian 8 Route Army Clique, would be a certainty.
